A.D.I.A.

Maybe some kind of rock climbing wall

Likes structure as is. Replace it with something similar.

Something for adults too, like at Mooney's Bay, so that both kids and adults can get a workout at the same time!

right, an adult playstructure doesn't seem to be part of their project but it doesn't hurt to express the need for more joint use facilities in our outdoor playgrounds both for families and for our aging population. At least, if the city hears it over and over, then they may consider eventually adding it one of the parks in our area.

Steve MacLean park had two playground options, then the public voted and the city went with the majority. Inverness also is relatively new and heavily used in case you wanted options to suggest to the city, although having different equipment than those parks may give families the option to have some varied in our neighborhood so it is different and fun for the kids. Too bad, though, it sounds like the city is keeping the structure for the older kids and only replacing the swings, play hut and an accessible bench. Maybe they can find funds elsewhere to add an adult structure or maybe they could consider a new project in the future.

I'm so happy to know that movement is happening with our beloved neighbourhood park! I also agree with many of these wonderful suggestions!

Not entirely on topic but I know our family would love to see a splash pad as a future addition/ something my children dream of having so close!

Something similar for smaller kids to continue enjoying the park too! With a climbing wall would be great. A splash pad would also be fun

Like Meredith's pic too. Its for the right age group. Its a toddler structure that you're replacing not an older kids structure.
